Responses to Elementary Student Council Questions

We started one last year as a way of getting the student stakeholders involved in our school improvement process. We meet once a quarter. Each room selects a representative. They have a class meeting and brainstorm topics that are a concern for their room. Each representative has time during the council meeting to present their room's ideas and concerns. We hold the meeting during lunch hour and I provide pizza for the group. This has really been good for both the students and the school. We have improved the communication within the building. Students are taking more responsibility at getting the message out especially on behavior issues. They bring a concern to the meeting and we all work on a way to solve the problem. That ownership is a terrific motivator.

We have a representative from each homeroom and run elections for officers. They do service projects like raking and senior citizen lunches.

We started the same thing two years ago - didn't really activate it last year, but we are going to do it again in 2007. We did the same thing you are considering. President had to be a 5th grader, Vice - 4th grader and Secretary could be from 3rd, 4th or 5th. We asked for representatives from each classroom and we asked for input from the K-2 to consider during the meetings. It worked very well and the students were very active. We intend to put in a service clause this year. The students volunteered during parent nights and we bought them Student Council shirts to wear. It worked very well, but you need someone (an adult) that will keep pushing it. Kids love it.

I have a student leadership team - consisting of my 3rd and 4th graders. I will be happy to share information if you are interested.

We have a Student Council for grade 3-5. The officers (5th graders only) are elected by the end of September by their peers. We have a campaign week with banners, and speeches prior to the election. Students in grades 3-4 elect their own class reps by quarter. Student Council meets one to two times per month to discuss student issues, goals, plan service projects and fundraisers. They also participate in whatever community activities are appropriate.
